Clothed fancy, which seemed to soften stone, and ex- shapes of stone horns—the thousand forms of the standing down out of the Cathedral: the projecting shapes of busts, that look like pieces of ancient poet's standing up; the standing up of a niche, others standing forth: the deep doorways; the statues of saints; some making es within others, surrounded much by much of the richness of the ornamentation of the front: the arch- windows. The House of the Seven Gables

For all practical purposes the house has been empty for years, and its daily wear and tear have taken their toll. The rooms are in a state of decay.

It seems to me that the house is haunted. There are whispering voices in the night, and the wind howls through the broken windows.

Yet there is something strangely beautiful about the place. It is as if the past were frozen in time, waiting to be rediscovered by those who seek it.

However, I must say that the house is not without its charms. There are rooms filled with ancient furniture, and paintings that seem to come alive under the right light.

Perhaps it is because of this that I find myself drawn to the house, even though I know that it is not safe. I have heard stories of strange occurrences, of people who went missing never to be found.

But I am fascinated by the house, and I cannot help but return to it again and again. I have come to believe that there is a magic in the place, a power that cannot be explained by science or logic.

And so I continue to explore the house, to uncover its secrets and to discover what lies hidden within its walls.
